Combat the Winter “Blues”

Seasonal Affective Disorder (SAD) is a type of depression that is related to the changing of the seasons. Typically, people are affected during the change from fall to winter when the days get shorter and the sunlight is limited, but it can also occur when spring rolls around. Some signs and symptoms are similar to depression: feeling sad, hopeless, or worthless, sluggish, fatigued, difficulty concentrating, etc. Some options to help combat SAD include getting adequate daily sun or light exposure, spending time outside, and exercising regularly. Some people also take vitamin D supplements, as your body naturally makes this when exposed to sunlight.

Winter Exercise Tips

Continuing to exercise during the winter can be a difficult and expensive task with the inclement weather, especially here in Northeast Ohio. A safer and more cost effective approach to braving the weather outside or paying for your own gym membership for the winter months is to walk indoors. Visiting the mall with a friend or family member and walking past shops and passersby prevents any falls from occurring on ice as well as providing a warm environment to walk freely in. Setting a specific time to walk or a certain number of “laps” around the mall provides a goal to shoot for and serves as a number to increase as time continues. The American Heart Association recommends exercising for 30 minutes a day, 5 days per week to improve heart health and lower your risk of heart disease.
